Maple Sugaring

In the late fall, one of nature's most beautiful sights is the foliage of New England's maple trees. The leaves blaze with color. Their hues range from bright reds to rich golds.

In the spring, some trees offer more than just a visual treat. Early in the season, buckets hang from the sides of sugar maples. The buckets are collecting sap for the annual maple sugaring.

How much sap can be collected from a healthy tree? The amount varies from twelve to twenty gallons. Amounts in this range yield from two to four pounds of maple syrup. This leaves plenty of sap for the tree. The tree needs enough sap to nourish itself as it enters a new growing season.

The weather has a great deal to do with how much sap a tree produces. The flow is greatest when the days are sunny and the nights are cold. The flow of sap slows down at night; it increases during the day. Maple trees in low, wet areas produce more sap than trees in higher and drier parts. However, the sap from wetter areas contains less sugar.

Native Americans showed the first settlers how to make maple syrup. They made gashes in the trees with axes to let the sap run out. However, this could cause considerable damage to the tree. Today, tree farmers bore a small hole into each tree, about three feet above the ground. This way, they do no harm.

When it seeps from the tree, the syrup is in crude form; it needs to be refined before it is ready to use. It is boiled in large kettles until the water evaporates. The remaining syrup is passed through filters to clean it. It is then ready to be poured on waffles and pancakes. It can also be made into candy. Maple sugar candy is very popular with visitors to New England.

Maple syrup is produced only in North America. The sugaring season lasts just four to six weeks. Besides New England, several other northern states carry out maple sugaring. The Canadian provinces of Quebec and Ontario also produce maple syrup. Much of the syrup that Americans pour on their pancakes is not real maple syrup, however. It is made from cane sugar syrup with artificial maple flavoring added. Sometimes the makers blend it with real maple syrup. That way, the label can say "Contains Real Maple Syrup." One hundred percent maple syrup costs more. Still, those who enjoy its taste say there is nothing like the real thing.
Answer each of the following questions in the form of a sentence. If a question does not contain a vocabulary word from the lesson’s word list, use one in your answer. Use each word only once.

1. What do the words “Contains Real Maple Syrup” on the label tell you?

2. Why do you think artificial maple syrup costs less than the real thing?

3. What is another word for the leaves of a tree?

4. In what season do maple trees become a visual treat?

5. If you were hiking in New England in the fall, what hues might you see?

6. How much sap can be collected from a sugar maple?

7. What is the meaning of yield as it is used in the passage?

8. Why do trees produce sap?

9. Why do you think people gathering sap prefer sunny days?
10. Why did the first settlers need axes to get at the sap?

11. Why don’t people use this method any more?

12. Explain why you might see small round holes in the trunks of sugar maples.

13. Why don’t people use the syrup that collects in the buckets immediately?

14. What happens when sap is boiled?

15. How often does maple sugaring occur?

FUN & FASCINATING FACTS

- Here are two more pairs of homophones. The first is bore and boar; a boar is a male pig. The second is hue and hew; to hew something is to cut it or chop it with an ax.

- Crude and refined are antonyms. (Crude sugar is purified by boiling and filtering; it then becomes refined sugar.)
